

Delta Adjusts Domestic and International Flying

Delta is adjusting its domestic and international flying to align with expected demand trends during the COVID-19 (coronavirus) outbreak.

The airline will reduce its planned systemwide capacity by 15 percent compared to what was previously scheduled.

By region, reductions include:

10-15 percent in domestic U.S.

5 percent in Latin America

15-20 percent in trans-Atlantic

65 percent in trans-Pacific

The airline's priority is to ensure the safety and security of customers and employees, and it will continue adjusting service as necessary. Delta has also expanded its aircraft cleaning processes to include a fogging procedure that disinfects common surface areas with a safe, high-grade EPA-registered disinfectant highly effective against many communicable diseases, including coronaviruses. Following the fogging procedure, cleaning crews thoroughly clean cabin surfaces including tray tables, seatback screens, and lavatories.

Domestic U.S.

Delta is trimming its domestic seat capacity by 10-15 percent, with reductions focused on higher frequency markets. Delta will continue to offer customers industry-leading connectivity with the reduced schedule.

Latin America

Delta is reducing its Latin America capacity by 5 percent, with reductions focused on higher frequency markets. Delta will support partner Aeromexico by flying one daily roundtrip between New York-JFK and Mexico City, and two daily roundtrips between Los Angeles and Mexico City between May 2 and August 16.

Trans-Atlantic

Complete list of service cancellations and reductions can be seen here.

Trans-Pacific

Complete list of service cancellations and reductions can be seen here.

In addition to adjusting flight schedules, Delta continues to waive many change fees. A complete list of waivers and schedule adjustments is available here.

The latest information about Delta's response to COVID-19 is available in the link below.